

Why Glass Kitchen Splashbacks Never Go Out of Style

A funny thing happens during a kitchen renovation. Everyone talks about the stone, the cabinetry and the tapware. Then the splashback goes in, and suddenly the whole room feels finished. That's probably why glass kitchen splashbacks keep finding their way into both new homes and renovations. They don't fight for attention. They just seem to belong.

It Rarely Starts with the Glass

Most conversations begin with the kitchen itself.

A window might sit lower than expected. A row of power points can throw standard sizes out completely. Sometimes there's only a few millimetres between a cupboard and the rangehood. That's where a custom glass splashback makes sense. It's measured after the kitchen is in place, so the panel follows the room.

Things People Notice After Living with It

The comments tend to be surprisingly similar.

- Dinner is cleaned up with one quick wipe.
- The room feels brighter in the morning.
- Grease isn't sitting in grout anymore.
- The finish still looks fresh months later.
- Friends usually ask about the splashback before anything else.

None of those things sound dramatic on their own. Together, they change how the kitchen feels to use.

More Than Just a Finishing Piece

People choosing glass kitchen splashbacks in Melbourne aren't always chasing a trend. Quite often they're replacing tiled splashbacks they've lived with for years. They already know what annoyed them, and they don't want to repeat it.

That's why the conversation usually ends up being about fit, cleaning and getting the details right, rather than colour or fashion.

A kitchen gets used every single day. The little decisions are often the ones that last the longest.

If your renovation is almost there, finish it with glass kitchen splashbacks from Clearly Frameless.
